IN THE UNITED

Guenther, Frankfort, Germany.)-The Frankfurter Zeltung, of Dec. 24, 1904, prints an article from which I have translated the following extracts:

The experience with dry summers has called the attention of agricultural technicians to the question of irrigation. The farming interest pays attention to every factor of production except one of the most important-the supply of water-which it leaves to accident, although optional irrigation can influence productiveness in the most extraordinary degree. As to how great this influ-ence is, the opinions of experts differ, the conditions of climate and soil play-

(From United States Consul-General June of the Chief insurances against crop failures. An article appears in the Periodical for Agrarian Politics with reference to soil irrigation in Germany, which treats of a report by Dr. Traugott Mueller, of the agricultural department, on American irrigation. Dr. Mueller has traveled in the United States in connection with the world's fair. He writes:

ir. He writes: "Just at the moment I had the opporunity to note in the far west of the United States the development of a vegetation with really wonderful rapidity and luxuriousness, the richness of which, in contrast with the surroundrought. The desert of America had assist in part to alleviate the wants Europe. From irrigated farms in drought. to assist in part to alleviate the wants of Europe. From irrigated farms in Nevada whole shiploads of lucern hay were shipped to Atlantic ports for Europe. The hay was grown upon fields for which the scant water supply had been artificially collected and sparingly distributed, and was sent to lessen the consequences of the drought in Europe, where numerous small and large streams are sending their waters continually to the sea. The question forced itself upon the observer, How is it that this insurance policy is not yet forced itself upon the observer. How is it that this insurance policy is not yet practised by us? The idea is not a new one with us, but it is a different thing to carry it out. We have known for many years what enormous quantities of fertilizing material our streams and rivers carry off, and we have known how much our acres and the plants thirst at times for water. We also know the fructifying effects of water, even on the poorest soil; but all this has not impressed us with the necessity for economical distribution of our water supply. When this supply was considered at all, it was exclusively for the ing desert, it is scarcely possible to describe credibly, the daily papers of Europe were filled with complaints over sidered at all, it was exclusively for the purpose of navigation, and the result has been only to carry off the water even more rapidly. We also have our dry regions, and above all we have our poor soil districts, which would be greatly benefited by the addition of fertilizing material, and we have in our rivers sources of wealth which would more than neutralize the poverty of rivers sources of wealth which would more than neutralize the poverty of the land. They are, however, not available to German agriculture.

"Propositions to come to the rescue of hard-pressed agriculture, to uphold it against the competition of the young productive countries in far-off continents, are legion. An immense amount of force is expended, not to say wasted, in passing political measures, the benefits of which remain chimerical. They will never bring us that which alone lits of which remain chimerical. They will never bring us that which alone can help the agricultural interest of middel Europe, i. e., increased production at the same or even at a reduced cost of production. A policy which would look upon the water of rivers as an aid to cultivation of the first rank would be an effective means to that end, and if willnesses were to be found. end, and if willingness were to be found it would not be difficult to obtain these
